Guidelines for titles

The title of the paper should not exceed 60 characters, spaces included. Double titles (such as "Making Art: Medieval Methods for Calculating Building Volume and Area") are discouraged. There is a very practical reason for this. Titles with subtitles are very much in fashion right now; most authors want to use them because they provide an opportunity for a poetic as well as prosaic expression of the paper's content. However, some indexes only use the main title in metadata, so that those searching for what they need may not find your paper as easily as if the more prosaic subtitle appeared immediately. Further, your important subtitle will disappear from the running headers in the print version, leaving only the poetic but less descriptive main title. The editors reserve the right to modify titles.

This is what happens to your title if it is too long. It appears on the first page of the article like this:

!Original title

But when it appears in the running headers in the remainder of the text it is abbreviated:

!Abbreviated title

To avoid unhelpful abbreviations, the title of this article could have been:

The Proportional Systems of Alejandro de la Sota

This is why we have established the 60-character limit on titles. If you feel you must use a double title, please use the descriptive part first.
